James Finlay, a London freelance photographer, purchased his XPan just two days before he left for an expedition on the Arctic Ocean, north of Canada.

"Going to an ultimate landscape, I had to have a suitable landscape camera with me. The camera held up outstandingly well in the extreme Arctic conditions. I shot mainly on the A setting using the auto bracketing feature, as in -45C temperatures my fingers couldn't feel the camera too well," said James.

This startling image is looking along the spine of the first pressure ridge on the Arctic Ocean, a few miles north of Ward Hunt Island some 500 miles from the North Pole. James' images were exhibited at the Getty Images Gallery.
